Section 1: Foundations of Leadership

In Stephen Covey's renowned book, "The 7 Habits of Highly Effective People," Habit 2 prompts us to "begin with the end in mind." What does this principle entail for your leadership journey? While for some, it may entail aiming for a promotion or increased income, it's essential to pause and reflect on what true leadership entails.

This work aims to inspire you to consider the kind of leader you aspire to become. It emphasizes that this aspiration is more profound than merely achieving results. Why? Because ultimately, you cannot surpass your own character and values.

So, let's look at who you want to be as a leader. For a moment, think back to leaders you have worked for, and leaders you have admired, and jot down some qualities they held that you think are important.

How did they motivate? How did they behave during high-intensity moments? How were you treated if you made a mistake? How did they encourage collaboration? How did they receive truthful feedback?

My Leadership Journey

You've examined qualities, characteristics, and skills of leaders you admire and noted down ones you'd like to emulate. Now, take a moment to envision the future. Picture yourself five years from now, receiving the Harvard Business Review's Leader of the Year award. As you stand on stage accepting the accolade, what are people saying about you? What do your team members think of you? And how about your colleagues?

Make a list of the things you imagine your team and colleagues saying about you. What qualities did they list for you? How have you impacted them?

“Start with the end in mind. ”
